   People are seldom aware that their comfortable living depends upon the work of several thousands of persons. The first thing, for instance, almost everyone looks forward to in the morning is a hot cup of tea. This cup of tea embodies the work of thousands of people. This can be easily shown. Consider the number of things we require to prepare a cup of tea, such as clean drinking water, tea, sugar, milk, gas burner, pot, crockery, strainer, spoon and so on.

   Consider first the supply of clean drinking water. In large cities this is rendered possible because of the construction of huge reservoirs of great cost and the regular maintenance of the water supply system by hundreds of workers. Tea is grown in distant plantations and made available to the consumers through a vast network employing hundreds of workers. Consider further the machinery required for sugar mill. The production of this machinery involves a long chain of processes and operation – mining of coal and iron ores, manufacture of steel and machine tools, in which thousands of workers are employed. The same argument holds good with regard to the supply of milk. The production of other items such as gas, burner, crockery, spoons, etc. requires the service of hundreds of workers.

   And recall how agitated we are if the milk van is late in the morning – may be because its tyre has burst on the way. This may be due to its poor maintenance or bad condition of the roads. A good cup of tea indeed thus represents the work of several thousands of persons.

   a. What do many people crave for early in the morning?
   b. What are the things and ingredients we need to make a cup of tea?
   c. Why does the writer talk about mining of coal and iron ores, manufacture of steel and machine tools?
   d. What is the cause for delay in getting milk in the morning?
   e. 'A cup of tea represents the work of several thousands of persons.' Substantiate with your own answer.
